When I first read you question, I thought the obvious answer is no. But then I read the details and the answer is yes. The reason your penis got swollen was most likely because of what you used for a lubricant. The likelihood that you get an STD from masturbate is probably less likely than getting struck by lightning. But there are things that can improve your probability. If you play out in a field during every lightning storm, your probability of getting struck increases significantly. So if you have a strange family and they masturbate into your shampoo bottle and they have gonorrhea or chlamydia. Then yes you could possibly contract those STDs from masturbating.

If your masturbating solo then no. If your masturbating with some one else then there might be a slight possibility of getting stds that way. Std's are usually passed when you have some kind of sexual contact with some one that has one.

You might want to give your self a break, use some proper lube and stop doing it in the shower.

The swollen member could be some thing from the water or some thing that you were using in the shower before you masturbated, it could have gotten up there and caused an infection or bacteria build up.

If the swelling doesn't go down you may want to have a doctor check it out just to be on the safe side.

No. You cannot get an STD from Masturbating. Especially if you have never had sex before. You can only get an STD from sex.
